DEATH

2025 | Dark Comedy | 72 mins | 2.59:1 | Color | Digital | USA

“Angels Near Death” is a love letter to the cinema that raised me, and a quiet cry to those who still believe in its power. I came to Hollywood with a dream: to tell a story bold enough to mark its time, something that might echo the way Star Wars once did. But as the world grew more fragile, I felt my imagination dim. Before my student visa expired, I made this film—not as a goodbye, but as a gift. A gentle reminder that cinema still matters. And if it finds its way into someone else’s heart, I hope they walk away with this truth: dreaming is not a luxury—it’s the light we carry through the dark.

LOGLINE

In the City of Angels, six eccentric strangers cross paths after near-death experiences, interweaving the journey of love, death, and the human spirit.

SHORT SYNOPSIS

In the City of Angels, Oscar, a filmmaker who takes his own life to reunite with his lost love, and Alice, a journalist killed by a photographer, cross paths with others equally lost in a spectral realm where dreams fade and souls linger. Together, they embark on a daring journey to reclaim their bodies and resurrect the beautiful lives they were meant to live.

LONG SYNOPSIS

“Angels Near Death” is a dark comedy with interconnected stories that come together to form the tapestry of life, or intertwined lives, like many strings woven to create a hangman's noose. In the City of Angels, Oscar, a set dresser lost in the machinery of cinema, works tirelessly with blood, sweat, and tears until spilling his own blood transforms his life in ways he never expected. His girlfriend, Victoria, a dedicated actress who plays a sinister spirit in the horror film “The Mother's Bed,” blurs the line between performance and reality after work, turning their apartment into her personal haunted ground. Alice, once a novelist, leaves fiction behind to report for “The Hollywood Disaster,” only to discover that life itself often surpasses even the wildest stories. Her fiancé, Henry, switches from avant-garde filmmaking to nursing, convinced that while art can inspire, only hands and bandages can truly heal a human wound. Art, a photographer obsessed with capturing death through photo montage, follows his subjects to their final moments only to realize that his own passing becomes his greatest masterpiece. Cher, directing the outrageous slasher “Chopsticks,” in which a Chinese girl wields kung-fu against scumbags, soon realizes that the chaos on screen is spilling into the real world. Six eccentric strangers meet on body and soul in the spiritual world, where dreams go to die, embarking on an expedition to resurrect themselves and live beautiful lives again.

A CONVERSATION WITH HUNGYU KUO

Let's start with the title: what does "Angels Near Death" refer to?

"Angels Near Death" refers to Los Angeles, once the beating heart of Hollywood and a symbol of boundless dreams, but it no longer feels like the place of hope it once was. It's a city in decline, breathing its last breath. Yet within that breath lies the potential for revival. I believe the city can be restored if we return to what made it magical: belief in dreams, imagination, and originality.

The title also evokes near-death experiences: deeply transformative moments of detachment, clarity, and personal awakening. In the film, each character confronts their near-death moment, leading them to rediscover who they truly are. For me, that reflects the experience of watching or making a film—something inside us changes, and we come out the other side just a little more alive.

What sparked the idea of the film?

The idea stemmed from my uncertainty and insecurity as a newcomer pursuing filmmaking in Hollywood. I imagined who I might become in the near future and wrote those possibilities into six characters. Oscar is a filmmaker stuck on low-budget sets, never given the chance to tell his own story, yet he refuses to give up despite a lifetime of struggle and disappointment.

Alice, once a fiction writer, is now a journalist who no longer believes in imagination and writes only about real life, convinced that reality is more absurd than fiction. Victoria is an actress so deeply immersed in her roles that she begins to lose the ability to separate performance from reality. Henry gave up filmmaking to become a nurse. Once driven by the belief that cinema could make a difference, he now seeks to help people in more practical ways. Art is a successful photographer who misuses his influence and manipulates others for personal gain. Cher is a young, ambitious filmmaker working her way up in the industry. I placed these six characters in the arena of Hollywood, where dreams, identity, and ambition collide to see how they would transform and, in turn, reflect different parts of myself.

What challenges did you face during production?

The biggest challenge was believing in myself and continuing forward despite every obstacle. Producing and shooting a feature film as an international student in Los Angeles is no small feat. From navigating the legal complexities of starting an LLC, launching a crowdfunding campaign, and securing SAG contracts, to assembling a dedicated cast and crew and filming in just ten days with a single camera and a twenty-person team, there were moments when it all felt impossible.

During the hiring process, many producers and crew members questioned how I would pull it off. The truth is, I didn't have all the answers. I broke down more than once, but after wiping away the tears, I returned to work. Because this is what I love. Filmmaking is my passion. Looking back, I realize I made it through because of two things: my unwavering love for cinema, and the steadfast support of my girlfriend, Cher, who believed in me through it all, just as Ang Lee's wife believed in him at the beginning of his journey.

Which filmmakers or films influenced this project?

With budget constraints limiting me to two-character conversations, I found inspiration in Jim Jarmusch, whose films show that dialogue-driven storytelling can be visually captivating and emotionally resonant. The film's surreal tone is influenced by my greatest inspiration—David Lynch, particularly his work, "Mulholland Drive."

What's next?

I plan to create a groundbreaking slasher film that revitalizes the horror genre and sets a new standard for modern horror.
